The master’s degree in Educational Psychology equips students to apply psychology in educational settings and conduct research in education. A master’s degree in Educational Psychology is an extremely versatile degree that is valuable for all educators, including teachers and administrators, seeking to further their understanding of: (a) student learning and effective instruction; (b) motivation, self-regulation, and self-efficacy; and (c) human cognitive, social, and personal development; and (d) peer cultures and peer aggression.

The degree is additionally valuable for persons seeking employment in school districts and other educationally related organizations or may be used for entry into an educational psychology doctorate program for a career in a university setting. This graduate degree does not lead to certification in any area.
